UPNVJ Public Relations – The Master of International Relations program at the Faculty of Social and Political Sciences, Veteran National Development University Jakarta (UPNVJ), offers a number of academic advantages for prospective students who wish to delve deeper into global security and economic diplomacy. This was conveyed by the Coordinator of the Master of International Relations program, Dr. Hartanto, SIP, MA, in an interview with UPNVJ Public Relations. With its strategic campus location in Jakarta, affordable tuition fees, and cutting-edge curriculum, this program is positioned as a relevant choice to meet the needs of higher education in the field of international relations.

Dr. Hartanto explained that UPNVJ's Master's Program in International Relations has received Good accreditation from BAN-PT. This achievement serves as an important foundation for strengthening academic governance and developing the quality of learning. Furthermore, the campus's presence in Jakarta is considered to provide added value by facilitating student access to literature, scientific forums, government institutions, and various national and international activities related to international relations studies.

One of the key strengths of UPNVJ's Master of International Relations program lies in its dual concentration, combining international security and economic diplomacy. This combination is considered unique and rarely found in similar programs. This approach is designed to enable students not only to understand the dynamics of global politics and security but also to understand the increasingly complex developments in international economic cooperation.

In terms of teaching, this study program is supported by experienced lecturers with diverse backgrounds, ranging from academics and practitioners to international guest lecturers. This faculty composition is expected to enrich students' perspectives through a combination of theory, practice, and global insight. The curriculum is also said to be continuously updated adaptively to align with changing contemporary international issues.

Graduates of the UPNVJ Master of International Relations program have broad career prospects. They can work as academics, researchers, bureaucrats, public officials, activists in non-governmental organizations (NGOs), and even entrepreneurs. This spectrum of professions demonstrates that international relations scholarship is not only relevant in education and government but also crucial in research, advocacy, and business.

Dr. Hartanto emphasized that UPNVJ's Master's Program in International Relations is the right choice for prospective students seeking a more comprehensive understanding of global security and economic diplomacy. With its strategic location, cost-effectiveness, and expanding international network, the program is expected to produce graduates ready to contribute at both the national and global levels.

In line with UPNVJ's commitment to strengthening the quality of higher education, the Master of International Relations Program at the Faculty of Social and Political Sciences (FISIP) continues to be encouraged to produce superior, adaptive, and competitive graduates. This effort also forms part of the institution's efforts to expand access to quality education and strengthen UPNVJ's role as a state university responsive to global challenges.
